this second wound, more painful than grievous, put an end to the military service of Affiant, who was reduced to lameness, for several months; he can show yet the scars of his two wounds, and nevertheless he has never received any pay or compensation for his service. Whenever he has applied to the proper authorities either by himself or by Attorney, he has always received for answer, that his name was not found on any list or muster roll, as if the neglect of the Superiors, or the want of a regular organization could destroy the reality of the service truly rendered.

Affiant considers that the actual laws of the State regulating the matter, have taken in consideration the reality of the service rendered, when satisfactorily proven, more than the formality of an inscription in a muster roll, more or less faithfull, and the most part of the time made in a hurry; and, under the engagement to prove the truth of his statement satisfactorily, he makes the present affidavit to obtain the military pension to which he considers himself justly entitled under the laws in force, granting said pension to the surviving veterans of the revolutionary war.
